153 “Deaths Worth Noticing”

Another Deadly Year

2004 proved to be another deadly year for domestic violence in Pennsylvania. In the end, 153 people lost their lives – 110 victims murdered in acts of domestic violence; the rest, perpetrators who committed suicide or were killed in the commission of a domestic violence crime.

The Pennsylvania Coalition Against Domestic Violence (PCADV) publishes this report in an effort to convey the lethality of domestic violence and the stunningly brutal manner in which perpetrators kill and victims die right here in this Commonwealth.

Source/Limitations of Information

Information for this report is obtained through newspaper clippings; the banners at the top of each page are headlines or quotations pulled directly from the articles. It’s not intended to be inclusive of all domestic violence fatalities occurring during 2004, but it’s the most reliable information, since Pennsylvania does not mandate domestic violence incident reporting by law enforcement.

Identifying Fatalities

For the purposes of this report, we’ve included fatalities that involved family or household members, spouses/ex-spouses, current or former intimate partners, persons who share biological parenthood and bystanders killed in domestic violence-related incidents.

Please note that we have excluded child abuse deaths since they are officially tracked and reported by the PA Department of Public Welfare, Office of Children, Youth and Families.

Incident Details

The amount of information on each incident varies, depending on the extent of media coverage. It’s astounding to us that domestic violence murders have become so commonplace that some merit no more than a blurb at the bottom of a page. One Pennsylvania newspaper columnist referred to them as “predictable and thus less newsworthy.” His rule of thumb? Three paragraphs – unless, of course, “it’s about a rich or famous victim or perpetrator.” Then the tragedy becomes, as another reporter calls it, “a death worth noticing.”

Take Notice

PCADV believes that every domestic violence death is a death worth noticing. So please, as you read this report, notice the ages of the victims, the relationships to their killers, the children who witnessed the murders or discovered the bodies, the communities they lived in and the viciousness with which they died. They were beaten, bludgeoned, burned, strangled, stabbed, slashed and, the majority of them (as represented by the red silhouettes on the cover), shot to death. It should come as no surprise that guns were involved in more than half of all these deaths. Study after study has proven that guns and domestic violence are a deadly mix and, in fact, victims of domestic violence are five times more likely to be killed when batterers possess firearms.

Behind the Numbers

You’ll see in this report that the majority of women (53 of the 63 female victims) were murdered by current or former intimate partners compared to nine (9) of the 38 male victims. The majority of men were killed by other men, which is reflected in the gender breakdown of perpetrators – 87 males and 12 females. Pennsylvania’s domestic violence fatality statistics support national research which indicates that intimate partner violence is primarily a crime against women, and women are much more likely than men to be killed by an intimate partner.

A Call for Action

Indeed, every death is a death worth noticing, worth mourning, worth remembering. Every death leaves behind shattered lives, orphaned children, devastated families, shocked friends and neighbors. Every death deserves our outrage and every death requires a collective call to action – to close loopholes in laws, improve systems’ responses, increase public awareness and promote real social change – change that ultimately will stop the killing.

Hope for Change

We can only hope that change will come soon so that in years to follow we’ll have fewer and fewer deaths to notice.
