Overview of the Femicide Report

The Minnesota Coalition for Battered Women (MCBW) tracks homicides in which the known or suspected perpetrator was a current or former intimate partner or the homicide is the result of domestic violence between current or former intimate partners. This includes family members, friends, and interveners who are killed as a result of the domestic violence being perpetrated by a current or former intimate partner.

History of the Report

For over 25 years, MCBW has been producing the annual Femicide Report. The information contained within these 27 years of reports is overwhelming in terms of the numbers of individual deaths that are recorded. The reports list the number of people killed, however they do not reveal the enormous number of people impacted by those deaths, nor do the reports reflect the hundreds of thousands of individuals who, across these years, have experienced domestic violence and survived.

What the Report Measures

In 1989, MCBW began collecting the names of women killed by domestic violence. The report has always recorded the deaths of women killed by current or former boyfriends and husbands. Over time, the report has evolved in terms of the definition of which deaths were included in the report. The report has expanded to include anyone killed due to domestic violence between current or former intimate partners. This includes the homicides between lesbian, gay, bi-sexual, and/or transgender current and former intimate partners, as well as cases of men killed by their current and former intimate partners. The report also documents the deaths of other family members, friends, neighbors, interveners, and bystanders who are killed due to domestic violence between current or former intimate partners.

Since 1993, the report has included those killed as a result of being used in prostitution or sex trafficking. These deaths are included because MCBW recognizes prostitution and sex trafficking as a system of violence against women and children. These numbers were tracked separately for a number of years but are now included in the general count.

While there has been some fluctuation over the years, MCBW is working to maintain a consistent definition regarding what is included in the Femicide Report. In recent years the report has consistently listed people killed in Minnesota due to violence by a current or former intimate partner.

What the Report Does Not Measure

The definition of domestic violence in Minnesota law is broader than the definition that we use for this report. The legal definition of domestic violence is physical violence or threats of physical violence between a family or household member. This includes violence between any family members or household members: adult child to parent, between cousins, roommates who have no intimate relationship, uncles who kill nieces, and parents who kill children. The Femicide Report focuses on one section of that broader definition of domestic violence. MCBW specifically looks at those killed by current or former intimate partners and as a result of domestic violence between current or former intimate partners.

Why do we limit our definition? While all of these homicides are tragic and there are many similarities, MCBW has expertise in intimate partner abuse. We hope that by limiting this report to the intimate partner definition and looking at those deaths in light of the research that has been done about lethality and risk factors for that specific population, we may find information to help improve our work to end domestic violence.

MCBW also only measures those killed in Minnesota. Sometimes a person from Minnesota is temporarily residing in another state and is killed while living there. That person would not be included in our count. Conversely, someone from Illinois or Wisconsin or New Jersey may be visiting Minnesota and be killed by their intimate partner while in Minnesota. We do include that homicide in our count. The reason we make this distinction is twofold. First, we do not have the capacity to monitor the homicides that occur in other states. Second, we gather the Femicide Report information in part to look at what we can do here in Minnesota to improve our work on domestic violence issues. In recent years, we have also included cases where the victim's body is found in Minnesota or where we have reason to believe the homicide occurred in Minnesota, even if the body was found in a different state.

Limitations of the Report

We rely on public information to create this report. In the early days of the report our sole source of information was media reporting. Currently, we identify most cases through media search results that are tracked daily, and then we follow up with local law enforcement agencies or county attorney's offices for more detail. We also look at other sources of information such as public court data, reports issued by medical examiners' offices, and social media. The way we gather information and the amount of data available to us has changed drastically over the years. However, we still struggle with inconsistent and incomplete information due to the discrepancies in the way information is collected and shared across the state.

We use the phrase "at least" when describing the number of people killed each year because we cannot be certain we have recorded all domestic violence homicides since we rely on public records, primarily news accounts. In addition, almost every year there are deaths of women that are considered suspicious but the cases are not resolved. No state or federal agency collects comprehensive data on domestic violence homicides. In addition, the murders of women and children of color, Native American people, immigrant and refugee women and children, those living in poverty, people with disabilities, rural women, lesbian/gay/bisexual/transgender people, and those exploited in prostitution and sex trafficking may be underreported in our listing as they frequently go unreported in mainstream media.

While we record all homicides that are a result of domestic violence between current or former intimate partners, we provide yearly comparison information on a series of factors exclusively concerning murdered women. We limit this analysis to women killed by intimate partners because we are looking at the research that has been done on risk and lethality factors for women in abusive relationships. It may be that men face the same risk and lethality factors in abusive relationships, but to our knowledge, that research has not been done.

The information in MCBW's Femicide Report is not meant to be research but rather, a compilation of data gathered from public sources. We gather this information to bear witness to those killed, to raise public awareness of domestic violence, and to help inform our work. One example of this limitation is in regard to tracking the rates of murder-suicides in domestic violence cases. For a number of years approximately 50% of the domestic violence homicides of adult women also involved the perpetrator subsequently committing suicide. This percentage was significantly higher than the homicide-suicide rate reported nationally at 30%. However, the last three years show a decrease. What we don't know, and what this report does not address, is why there is a difference and what the recent decrease means. MCBW is not a research agency. We present this information in the hopes of raising questions and opening the door to deeper conversations.

Overview of 2015

The number of Minnesotans killed due to domestic violence varies from year to year. We have seen yearly lows in the teens and highs in the 40s. Last year 23 Minnesotans were murdered due to domestic violence. This year, the number is higher. At least 34 Minnesotans were killed due to violence from a current or former intimate partner.

At least 22 women

Were murdered in cases where the suspected, alleged, or convicted perpetrator was a current or former husband, boyfriend, or male intimate partner.

At least 9 friends, family members or interveners

Were murdered in domestic violence-related situations.

At least 3 men

Were murdered in a case where the suspected, alleged, or convicted perpetrator was a current or former intimate partner.

At least 17 minor children

Were left motherless due to domestic violence murders.

Note: At the time this report was completed, MCBW was reviewing four additional cases. These deaths occurred in 2015 but MCBW is waiting for information on whether the deaths would be officially ruled homicides, and information on the nature of the relationship between the victim and suspected perpetrator. Once full information is public, MCBW will update this report and the revised report will be made available through MCBW's website. www.mcbw.org

Red Flags for Batterer Lethality

In this report, we pay special attention to women murdered by intimate partners, as the majority of women murdered in the United States and Minnesota are murdered in domestic violence homicides. In fact, over 80% of women murdered in Minnesota between 2010 and 2015 were murdered by a current or former intimate partner. In response to this national endemic, various tools to assess for high risk or potential lethality have been developed based on research of women killed by their intimate partners. While it is helpful to utilize and inform research and incorporate risk assessments in domestic violence cases, we must be cautious of how we use any tools that will determine our response to a victim. It is impossible to predict with certainty which batterers will become lethal to their victims. All batterers should be viewed as potentially dangerous, though there are well-documented indicators of lethality of which everyone should be aware. Included in the factors that have been identified as possible lethality indicators are: separation, extended history of domestic violence or other violence, pregnancy, threats or fantasies of homicide or suicide, access to firearms, threats to use a weapon, stalking, attempted strangulation, sexual assault, extreme jealousy, and control of daily activities.

No risk assessment tool should be used as the sole basis for providing victims access to services and resources, or safety planning with victims, but rather used in addition to other information, especially information provided by the victim. Research has shown that victims are often accurate in predicting future risk, and we should rely on their expertise about their lives.

We must also remember that for victims of domestic violence, interventions that only take into account the danger posed to them by their abusers – while failing to take into account the risks generated in their lives by their immediate personal circumstances – can also inadvertently make them less safe. While it seems counter-intuitive that victims do not cooperate in a criminal justice process that we deem will make them safer by convicting the offender, we must remind ourselves of the many victims in this report who did attempt to leave their abusers but were killed in the process or shortly thereafter, despite significant criminal justice system interventions.

The conversation around assessment of risks to victims of domestic violence cannot simply end in us adapting tools and developing protocols that focus on offender accountability alone; we must also improve the collaborations between criminal justice and community advocacy agencies and commit to being victim-centered.

Each year, MCBW looks at homicide cases in Minnesota and gathers any known information regarding key lethality factors. We specifically focuses on four lethality factors:

- the victim's attempts to leave the abuser;
- previous threats to kill the victim;
- perpetrator's access to firearms; and
- perpetrator's history of violence.

MCBW has been looking at these four lethality factors since 2006. For the past ten years, these lethality factors have been present in a significant number of cases. We would expect that a more complete analysis of public records and interviews with friends and family of the victims would yield more information on other cases and additional information on other red flags.

For each homicide case there is much to be learned from the individual circumstances, as the circumstances surrounding each death are complex and unique. We look at the key lethality factors with the expectation that this information is useful to inform public policy and intervention strategies.

There were 22 women murdered in Minnesota in 2015 by their intimate partners.

Victim's Attempts to Leave the Abuser:

While conventional wisdom persists that leaving an abuser will always make a battered woman safer, separation often increases the risks of further harm, as batterers “step up” their efforts to control or intimidate the victim. In 2015, 8 of the 22 cases of homicide occurred after the woman had left the relationship, while she was attempting to leave, or if she had made an attempt to leave in the year before she was killed. This is 36% of the cases. This statistic has ranged between 30 – 67% over the years. In many of the cases, information is not known as to whether the victim was planning on ending the relationship. Attempting or planning to leave a relationship does continue to be a significant factor when assessing lethality.

Eugenia “Gina” Tallman, and her 15 year old daughter, Victoria Alvarez were shot and killed by her husband, Gonzalo Galvan, in their South Minneapolis home. The couple’s 7-year-old son was present at the time of the murders, and was taken into protective custody. Gina had recently communicated to a family member that she had planned to leave the relationship. Gonzalo told law enforcement that he had confronted Gina after finding a backpack filled with money, accusing her of threatening to “leave him and take his son away from him,” according to the criminal complaint. Court records indicate that Gonzalo had three separate 5th degree assault-domestic charges (1995, 1997, 2001), none of which resulted in convictions.

Preparing to leave a relationship can be one of the most dangerous times for battered women. If a perpetrator is involved with the criminal justice system, victims may think that there is increased safety for them at that time. This may or may not be true depending on the level of control and monitoring that is happening from the criminal justice system. We know that in 2015, at least two of the victims were killed shortly after the abuser was convicted of a domestic abuse offense against them, and at least one of the women was killed shortly after an abusive incident was reported to law enforcement.

From our observation over the years, it is apparent that women often confide in family members, friends, or coworkers about their intention to leave an abusive relationship. As a community, we must educate ourselves about existing resources for victims such as voluntary and confidential services through domestic violence programs that can safety plan with victims. We must also look at this data to inform ourselves of the complex situations, such as homelessness or financial instability, that victims who are attempting to leave an abusive relationship can encounter, which can be added burdens and barriers to safety. We need to invest in collaborations that will assist victims in being able to access safety.

Threats to Kill the Victim: Threats by the abuser to kill the victim are among the most reliable indicators of lethality and are the most often overlooked by the criminal and civil justice systems. A review of the media reports of the 2015 murders does not reveal much information about threats to kill. We know that in at least 3 instances, the woman had experienced threats to kill and it is possible that threats to kill may have been part of prior abuse in additional cases.

Without access to and review of police case files and court records, it is difficult to determine whether threats to kill were made against the victim. While the absence of threats to kill does not tell us much, their presence can be a significant indicator of an abuser's risk of lethality. Those who work with victims and those who intervene in domestic violence cases should pay close attention when victims disclose that the perpetrator has made threats to kill.

April Erickson was shot and killed in her home in Maplewood on August 23rd. Her husband, Todd Tennin has been charged in April's death. April's 16-year-old daughter and 12-year-old son, as well as a 15-year-old family friend, were present in the house at the time of the homicide. April's daughter and her friend overheard the argument and shooting. The three children discovered her body.

April's son told police he retrieved a bloody gun from the bathroom and placed it in a windowsill because he was afraid that Todd would return and kill everyone.

The son recounted that Todd had threatened in the past, "If I ever kill your mom, I'm going to kill the rest of you so there are no witnesses."

Court records show that Todd had made many threats to kill his wife and her children, regularly abused them, and attacked April so brutally last year that she told a friend there was "blood all over the room" and "it looked like a murder scene."

Todd has an extensive criminal history, including several previous charges of assault and illegal possession of firearms. Records show that police were called to the home at least eight times within the last two years, including twice this past year — most recently, three weeks before April's murder.

Access to Firearms: In 2015, 11 of the 22 (50%) domestic violence homicides were committed with firearms. While the percentage of domestic violence homicides using firearms fluctuates from year to year, firearms are the most frequent weapon of choice, and firearms are used in about 50% of the documented domestic violence homicides (of women killed - 52% in 2011, 50% in 2012, 42% in 2013, 56% in 2014 and 50% in 2015). These statistics support the studies showing that possession of firearms by an abuser can increase the risk of lethality. In light of current debates regarding guns and gun safety legislation, it is helpful to consider these statistics.

Domestic violence firearm prohibitions are only as effective as their implementation. We need to look at how firearms were acquired. In 2015, in at least 36% of domestic violence homicides of women by firearms, the offender was prohibited from possessing a firearm at the time the homicide occurred. In the other firearms deaths, it appears the perpetrators had no firearms restrictions in place. For all offenses, we have very little data on where and how perpetrators accessed the firearm.

Julie Hildreth was shot and killed by her ex-boyfriend, John Plevell outside of the local American Legion in Aurora on November 8th. Several bar patrons reported to police that John had been in the establishment a short time earlier. He was upset about Julie's new relationship, and "suggested doing something to her and her new boyfriend if he saw them that evening."

Court records show that John was arrested on September 1st and charged with misdemeanor domestic assault and disorderly conduct for assaulting Julie. He was released on September 3rd, on a $1000 bail and pleaded guilty to the disorderly conduct charge in October, for which he was scheduled to be sentenced on November 18th. As he awaited sentencing he was subject to a Domestic Abuse No Contact Order (DANCO) that barred him from contacting or seeing her.

Julie had told law enforcement at the time that she was afraid Plevell could kill her because his violence was increasing.

Since there was no active Order for Protection against John at the time of the homicide and since the misdemeanor domestic assault charge against him had been dismissed, John was not automatically prohibited from possessing firearms, but the court could have made specific firearms orders as conditions of his release.

Observations About the 2015 Femicide Report

Missing and Inconsistent Data

MCBW invests significant time and resources collecting information on domestic violence homicide cases for the Femicide Report. While most of the information is public and mandatory for different system players to collect, we face challenges in gaining access to this information or find it is not consistently collected across the state.

We rely on criminal complaints and civil/criminal court records to gather histories of perpetrators and victims. The criminal information only tells part of the story. For instance, while we can collect data on past charges against a perpetrator, we do not know if those charges stemmed from an act of violence against an intimate partner. Often disorderly conduct, terroristic threats, or burglary charges stem from domestic violence but that information is not available through the public court records. Court records only reflect the incidents that reach the judicial system. Court records do not have consistent data on how many calls were made to the police and do not indicate an increasing number of calls made in the weeks prior to the homicide. In order to identify the gaps in the system that need to be filled to prevent domestic violence fatalities, we need reliable and consistent data collection on domestic violence incidents.

Economic Instability

Economic abuse is one tactic batterers use to maintain power and control over victims – it destabilizes victims' access to basic human necessities like employment, housing, food, transportation, and child care. Economic abuse can include prohibiting a victim from working or forcing a victim to work and taking her paycheck; making a victim lose her job or public benefits; forcing a victim to engage in prostitution; exploiting the fact that a victim who has taken care of children for years may be unable to get a living wage job if she leaves the abuser; forcing victims to commit criminal acts to support themselves and their children; denying child support or making it too dangerous to pursue child support; ruining a victims' credit or preventing her from having a credit history; causing a victim to get evicted from or denied access to housing.

Research indicates that a lack of financial resources is one of the most commonly given reasons domestic violence victims stay with or return to an abusive partner. A review of court records indicate that 12 of the 22 (55%) of the women who were murdered in 2015 had faced economic instability in the past. 11 of the 12 had suffered from a lack of economic resources in the past 5 years.

Disparate Impact

Crime occurs at similar rates across social boundaries, but communities of color and Native communities are disproportionately represented within the criminal justice system; they are also disproportionately represented in the victims of domestic violence homicide. In 2015, 5 of 22 victims were Native American (23%); 7 were African/African American (32%). We also know that victims' personal experiences with the criminal justice system, and those of the communities they belong to, can dictate whether or not they will reach out systems for help. The impact of disparate treatment can be seen in the criminal histories of the victims themselves. Of the 22 women killed by an intimate partner, 7 (32%) had substantial criminal histories. All of the Native women killed in domestic violence homicides had significant criminal histories. 5 of the 22 victims were on some form of criminal supervision at the time of their death.

Criminal Histories of Perpetrators

Each year, we attempt to look in depth into the criminal and civil histories of perpetrators to understand whether and how the system intervened prior to the homicide. While each year we find a number of cases where the perpetrator had prior involvement in the criminal justice system, in 2015 a large percentage of perpetrators had significant histories of domestic violence and those histories included numerous dismissed charges.

- Almost 60% of perpetrators (13 out of 22) had a history of domestic violence related charges.
- These 13 perpetrators had a total of 76 domestic violence related charges. Only 19 of the charges resulted in convictions. Four of the charges were pending at the time of the homicides; the remaining charges were dismissed.

Media Response

Media can be a powerful tool in raising public awareness of the complicated nature of domestic violence. However, every year, we notice significant differences in the amount of attention certain homicides receive in the media and within our communities. Often, domestic violence homicides of people of color and Native people, or people belonging to rural communities, are overlooked in the major news outlets or receive very little attention.

We also notice that relationships of victims and perpetrators of intimate partner homicides within the LGBTQ community, especially those existing in rural areas, are often miscategorized as “friends,” “roommates,” or “acquaintances,” in media reports. This makes the ability to identify intimate partner homicides that happen within the LGBTQ communities more difficult.

Beyond the issue of the lack of recognition of certain homicides, we have also observed that media coverage of domestic violence homicides often fails to contextualize them as such, and utilizes extremely problematic terminology such as “love triangle,” or “domestic dispute,” or passive language that disguises domestic violence.

In the media coverage of several cases of women murdered in 2015 where there was a history of dismissed charges against the perpetrator, few to none of the media outlets reported that information. Even in homicides where the perpetrator had a documented history of domestic violence, some media outlets did not recognize the murder as a domestic violence homicide.

Recommendations for Systems and Communities in Minnesota

While the ultimate responsibility for these murders rests with the perpetrators alone, opportunities for meaningful intervention in many of these cases were missed. Especially in the cases in which the victim reached out for help or the perpetrator was known to be dangerous, we should examine the reasons why our systems ultimately failed to protect those victims from lethal violence.

Data Collection & Sharing

Victims and the perpetrators who killed them interact with various systems that capture information which can be helpful in developing effective interventions and responses to domestic violence homicides. We recommend that:

- ❖ Criminal justice system agencies across Minnesota consistently capture information regarding intimate partner violence. This includes keeping data from 911 calls, arrests, charges, convictions, sentencing, incarceration, supervision, and violations. All agencies should collect reliable, quality data that more fully captures information relevant to domestic violence.
- ❖ Clear guidance be provided to all agencies collecting data with common definitions articulated to achieve greater consistency of data. Terms such as “domestic violence” should be defined and should include subcategorization to distinguish between intimate partner violence and family/household violence.
- ❖ Public data should be easily accessible. MCBW relies on public data for this report. Others should have access to the data as well. If we are to continue to refine policies to address domestic violence, there needs to be research and ongoing evaluation of data.

Criminal Justice System Changes

Over the past four decades, there have been many advancements in the criminal justice system's response to domestic violence. One thing we have learned, is that batterer accountability is not synonymous with victim safety. The histories of perpetrators in 2015 illustrate this reality. Despite repeated interventions by the criminal justice system, there were fatalities. The high numbers of dismissed charges and the high percentage of offenders with documented criminal histories indicate a need to further evaluate ways to promote victim safety. Our recommendations for the criminal justice system include:

- ❖ Increase the investment in quality Batterer's Intervention Programming (BIP) that is innovative, culturally appropriate, based on research, and locally accessible. Much of the current focus is on getting victims to leave and creating separation between a perpetrator and victim. There needs to be a serious investment in creating a process for change for batterers. While 60% of perpetrators (13 out of 22) had documented histories of domestic violence, only 4 of them (18%) had been charged with domestic abuse-related crimes against the victim that they killed. Without addressing the root causes of battering and changing perpetrators' behavior, there will always be another victim.
- ❖ Expand the criminal court's analysis of dangerousness to include an examination of the full range of criminal behavior. Lethality and risk assessments must include an examination of past patterns of charges including convictions and dismissals.
- ❖ Training for all personnel within the criminal justice system to increase awareness of domestic violence. With heightened awareness of the dynamics and causes of domestic violence, the various courts should consider ways to minimize further victimization within the various legal proceedings. For example, housing court may vary or enhance their responses to victims of domestic violence involved in unlawful detainer housing actions.

Enhance Economic Stability

Minnesota has a history of creating coordinated criminal justice response teams, which often include domestic and sexual violence advocates, law enforcement, prosecution, and corrections. Missing from these community response teams are key players from economic systems: landlords, housing and conciliation courts, homelessness and housing assistance providers, county economic assistance programs, employers, economic safety net programs, social service providers, and legal aid attorneys who assist with economic-related legal needs. Economic stability could be enhanced with the following recommendations:

- ❖ Broaden criminal justice response teams to include economic systems.
- ❖ Work with landlords and homelessness/housing assistance providers to prioritize homeless victims of domestic and sexual violence and to address policies that penalize domestic violence victims.
- ❖ Create policies and practices for prosecution and law enforcement to assess all victims for economic security issues and assist victims to connect with economic supports (housing, food, transportation, child care, employment, crime victim compensation, public benefits).

- ❖ Educate others in economic sectors, such as businesses, tax preparers, banks and lenders, utilities providers, to identify domestic and sexual violence and refer victims for advocacy assistance.

Address Racial Disparities

Many victims of color and Native victims experience added barriers and disparate treatment within our communities and the criminal justice system. All systems interacting with victims need to recognize the impact of trauma victims experience: trauma from battering; and also the historical and current day trauma of disparate treatment. The criminal justice system must be a resource and an option for all victims. As a starting point to improving all of our responses to domestic violence, we recommend:

- ❖ Examine the criminal justice response teams and other agency response teams to ensure that they reflect the full diversity of the community.
- ❖ Seek out the expertise of culturally specific domestic violence community organizations to provide leadership for criminal justice system response teams and others in addressing racial disparity issues; and develop policies that more effectively address barriers faced by specific communities.

Media Responses

Media plays a critical role in shaping the public awareness and understanding of domestic violence. The language the media uses can heavily impact the discourse in our communities which in turn can have severe consequences for victims of domestic violence. Media outlets range from the statewide radio, TV and print media to local journalists to social media. We recommend the following:

- ❖ All media partners undergo appropriate training to understand the dynamics of domestic violence and the importance of reporting on acts of domestic violence in context. Media should reach out to local domestic violence experts for their perspective when reporting on domestic violence issues.
- ❖ Media to examine the level and type of coverage provided to homicides that occur in various communities and ensure that all homicides are recognized.
- ❖ Examine reporting policies, including language usage, regarding domestic violence coverage.

Community-wide Solutions

Every year MCBW releases the Femicide Report. Every year the question is raised as to why domestic homicides continue at essentially the same rate. After nearly four decades of organized efforts to end domestic violence in Minnesota, that goal remains elusive: What do we need to do differently/additionally?

MCBW, in partnership with member programs and allied organizations from across the state, spent the past two years grappling with this question. The result is Empower Our Future: A Plan to End Domestic Violence in Minnesota (available at www.mcbw.org). The plan provides strategies and action steps that can be taken up by individuals, communities, and organizations. One priority area within the plan is prevention through social norm change. Intervention and response strategies are not the full answer. We must commit to prevention efforts to stop the violence before it starts. To stem the incidents of domestic violence, we must create environments where everyone knows that violence will not be tolerated and where healthy, respectful, and violence-free relationships are the norm for everyone.

To change social norms and create health environments, everyone must see domestic violence as their issue. Many of the victims whose deaths are documented in the Femicide Reports did not have any interactions with the criminal justice system. However, many of these victims did report the abuse to their friends, family members, employers, and others in their communities. A successful response to domestic violence can only be achieved with the investment of an entire community. Whether as a parent, a partner, within the workplace, or in neighborhoods, we all need to talk about domestic violence and work to create healthy communities where domestic violence is not accepted or tolerated. If we fail to keep safety as a top priority, women will continue to be killed and our communities destabilized.

Together, we can live violence free.

Challenge to Minnesota Communities

Domestic violence and domestic homicide have a devastating effect on every person living in Minnesota. Each of the victims whose story is told here is someone's daughter, son, mother, father, sister, brother, family member, intimate partner, friend, neighbor, or co-worker.

We pledge to remember the women, children, men, family members, and friends who die each year from domestic violence.

Our challenge to the community is to not let these deaths go unnoticed but rather to use these brutal murders as a springboard for action.

While we have research and tools that can assist us in identifying the people most likely to reoffend and those most likely to engage in high risk and lethal behaviors, nothing can predict with 100% accuracy the batterers who will seriously injure or kill. Some of the women injured and killed in Minnesota each year were so isolated or so disconnected that they never told anyone what was happening, and no one had any information about the abuse. Many of these women, however, did interact with our legal system, our medical system, our mental health system or they reached out to family, friends or community members. It is precisely in those cases where we can start to make a difference. We can learn from the tragic loss of life by taking action towards meaningful change.

Over the past decades, we have learned much about domestic violence. Our laws have improved; our advocacy and justice systems and the personnel within those systems have learned, changed and improved how they respond to domestic violence; we talk with our children about healthy relationships and about domestic violence. We applaud all of those efforts but we can do even better. That is the challenge we name for ourselves and for all of Minnesota.

On October 12th, he was charged with multiple counts including kidnapping, assault and terroristic threats, and a warrant was issued for his arrest.
